703 726 place. Only come nearer with her [the mare]! Jâ walad al-ḥalâl mâ hw ḥâẓer lâ čân ḥâẓer mâ čân ittuḳa' 'ank ḥâẓer min jesedd 'anneh mâr žarrebha ǧâj."

But if the hero happens to be present, he says: "Oh, who is inquiring for So-and-So? This is he. Thou hast reached him. Jâ nâšeden 'an flân hâḏa hw waṣelt ḥâẓer."

The comrades of both warriors then stop fighting, the better to observe the result of the duel, mulâḳa'. Both duellists first utter the battle cry of their tribe, adding: "Never say: 'He has surprised or tricked me.' Lâ tḳul ṛaṭarni w-bâḳni. Brace up now and defend thyself! ḫoḏ ḥaẓarak w-enfa' ḥâlak. Oh, how do I frighten heroes! Thou sneeredst at me and thy lips are twitching!" A duel always ends with the death of one of the warriors. Of the victor the tale quickly spreads: "He fought, tanâṭaḥ, with So-and-So."

726 782 Whoever catches sight of the chief during the battle and longs to defeat him, cries out: "O Allâh, help me to defeat the chief and I will sacrifice a fat she-camel to thee! jâ allâh baš-šejḥ w-fâṭer."

● 266 727 It is a fact that there are still many who drink the blood of the stricken enemy. 'Awde abu Tâjeh shouted: "O Allâh, give Da'sân to me that I may drink his blood!" Da'sân al-Hemš was a brave Šarâri warrior. Meeting him in a battle, 'Awde abu Tâjeh with a well-aimed bullet swept him from the saddle, jumped down on him, and, putting his mouth to the wound, drank his blood. Then he cut open his breast, tore out the still beating heart, and ate it.

726 782 A raider who wishes either for his brother or for himself to capture a fine mare on which the enemy is still sitting, calls out: "Oh, for the luck of So-and-So! [here he names his brother or himself], help me to throw this rider off his mare and I will sacrifice a she-camel! jâ baḫat flân beha-l-ḳlâ'a w-fâṭer." Then he shoots at the enemy, cuts him with his sabre or stabs him with his spear, and throws him from the saddle, ḳalla'eh 'anha.

726 628 A warrior coming face to face with an enemy by whose hand his father, brother, or another relative has fallen, shouts at him: "O So-and-So, I wish to avenge my father! jâ flân jâ beṭarârât abûj." If the other is not afraid he will answer: "Away with thee who rememberest a debt and askest for a settlement! tḫasa jâ ḥâfẓ ad-dên w-ṭâlbeh." But if he is afraid he begs: "I ask thy protection! Shouldst thou refuse it and